Key provisions of the Livable Communities Act

Incentives for regional comprehensive planning. The bill authorizes $400 million over four years to help regions develop plans that link transportation, housing, community and economic development, and environmental strategies.

Funding to implement sustainable development projects. Communities would be able to seek challenge grants to implement key projects contained in regional plans, including affordable housing, transit-oriented development, transit service, economic development, bike-pedestrian projects, and brownfield and infill redevelopment. This provision of the bill calls for $3.75 billion over three years.

Assistance for regional livability initiatives. The legislation ensures federal agencies are supportive partners in regional planning by establishing critical research and technical assistance capacities. A new Office of Sustainable Housing and Communities, within the U.S. Dept. of Housing and Urban Development, would coordinate federal policies, and serve as a resource for best practices and technical assistance.

An interagency council on sustainable communities. To facilitate interagency coordination, the council brings together the Depts. of Housing and Urban Development, and Transportation, Environmental Protection Agency, and other federal agencies to coordinate policy, research, training, and funding; identify barriers to sustainable development; and promote the linkage of transportation, housing, environmental, and energy policies.

Benefits of the Livable Communities Act

• Helps local communities plan and create better and more affordable places for Americans to live, work, and raise their families.
• Reduces traffic congestion, greenhouse gas emissions, and gasoline consumption.
• Protects rural areas, natural resources, and green spaces.
• Revitalizes retail and commercial corridors.
• Creates more affordable housing close to jobs, transportation, and amenities.

What is the Livable Communities Act?
The Livable Communities Act (S 1619 and HR 4690) would provide a multi-year authorization for federal sustainability initiatives. The bill authorizes $4 billion over four years for regional planning and challenge grants to make communities more livable, and eliminates federal barriers to sustainable development.
Employers are essential to livable communities

Through employer-assisted housing initiatives, employers around the country have discovered the advantage of having their workers living in quality, stable homes near jobs and transportation. Employer-assisted housing is a bottom-line benefit that promotes a stable workforce and strong communities. In addition to leveraging public-private partnerships in support of workforce housing, employer-assisted housing initiatives engage employers as advocates for livable communities.

Employer engagement pays off

The bottom-line benefits that employer-assisted housing initiatives bring to employers, and the sustainable communities that can be created by engaging employers in planning, demonstrate the value of expanding on lessons learned in Illinois:

- Since 2000, more than 2,000 employees in the Chicago region have purchased homes with financial help from their employers. The state’s tax credit and matching funds have contributed $2.3 million, and leveraged $8 million in down payment assistance from employers. This amounts to $400 million in home sales.

- Employers in Illinois have helped build community acceptance for needed housing development, as well as supported significant policy change, including strengthening links between workforce housing and job opportunities.

More employer partnerships are needed

The National Housing Conference, MPC, and REACH California support inclusion of language in the Livable Communities Act to encourage employer-assisted housing, with incentives that could leverage employer engagement.

With public and private-sector partners working together, communities can benefit from increased economic development, improved access to jobs and amenities, reduced housing and transportation costs for working families, and strong, livable communities.
